Macleod's early work was characterized by its use of bold colors and gestural brushstrokes. She often painted landscapes, but her work also explored more abstract themes. In the 1960s, she began to incorporate collage and assemblage into her work.

Mississippi

In 1970, Macleod moved to the Mississippi Delta. She was drawn to the region's rich history and culture, and she found inspiration in the landscape and the people. Her work from this period is often characterized by its use of earthy colors and geometric shapes.

Macleod's time in Mississippi had a profound impact on her work. She began to explore themes of race, identity, and spirituality. Her work also became more personal and introspective.

Southern Gothic

In the 1980s, Macleod began to develop a body of work that she called "Southern Gothic." This work explored the dark side of the American South, with its themes of violence, poverty, and racism. Macleod's Southern Gothic paintings are often characterized by their use of dark colors and ominous imagery.

Personal Journey

Macleod's work is often autobiographical, and it reflects her own personal journey. She has used her art to explore her own struggles with identity, loss, and redemption. Her work is also a celebration of the human spirit and the resilience of the human heart.

Spiritual Awakening

In the 1990s, Macleod began to experience a spiritual awakening. This experience led her to create a body of work that is deeply spiritual and meditative. Her work from this period is often characterized by its use of light and color, and it explores themes of hope, renewal, and transcendence.

Legacy

Joan Macleod is one of the most important Canadian artists of her generation. Her work has been exhibited in museums and galleries around the world, and it is held in the collections of major museums such as the Museum of Modern Art in New York City and the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa.

Macleod's work continues to inspire and challenge viewers. It is a testament to the power of art to transform and transcend.
